

Shane's Sister has a Shared Death Experience

Melvin Morse, MD retold in Glimpses of Eternity, Raymond Moody, MD

Shane, a seventeen-year-old boy, was struck by a truck and thrown through the air. He was taken to the hospital with massive head injuries. By the time his parents arrived, he had died while on life support. The parents went home to break the news to their fifteen-year-old daughter, who was deaf. When they went into the house they found her in a trance. She was talking to someone she said was her brother. She said she awoke from a nap and was able to look around the room but at the same time she seemed to be in another world. She described the accident to her parents and knew that her brother was dead, but she was also able to talk to him. "I'm going to show you something really cool," he said to her. He took her high above the accident scene and then, the girl said, they went to heaven. She could see her parents standing in the living room, but could see and communicate with her brother at the same time. "I know something you don't know." Shane said to his sister. He told her that their aunt was pregnant with a boy, a fact unknown to the family at that time. It was true.
